My case fall under crimes against humanity in physically forced sex restriction for 39 years by US military forces.

Crimes against humanity. Humans have a biological (innate) need (innate) for sex; its part of human physiology. If you were restricted (key word is restricted, force restricted; my case violently physically forced) from it than its a crime against humanity. They couldn't cover it up in their imagination that I was force restricted by their idea.

I didn't know of their idea then. In my case I was physically restricted from woman to perpetuate a lack of close interpersonal relationships to the point of sex (I wasn't allowed to hang out with them). I was restricted to not make friends with females in general. Its with intent by the US army or a government entity. I was put in college locations where the dorms were devoid of females for 4 years.

My study abroad programs were more obvious in how they physically separated me by separating me from females. My apartment was separated from females in the program. No contact exchange between me and the female participants of the program allowed by the US or no interaction there afterwards; preventing relationships. This was in Madrid, Spain. They were not exchanging contact to prevent communications by agenda.

In my second study abroad program in Leeds, England in was physically isolated from those in my age group and females in general. The program had the same format of not exchanging contact information with people of the opposite sex. The dorms were decrepit as well decrepit to the cost of the program; which indicated some sort of invectiveness in physical isolation; its caused by US military.

US responded "we made it too "obvious" in separating woman from him and then places devoid of females for 8 years. And in my study abroad programs the females are restricted to interact with me. All the woman liked me but I hung out with them but I wasn't allowed to go their places of living even thought they had a desire for me to be there with them.

They couldn't cover it up in their imagination either, it became a crime against psychology when they tried to cover it up.

The US Army openly posts up salacious material on the internet as a mockery of this particular crime.
